Remembering an important stop on the road to the White House

A photographic tribute to the 2008 DNC

“America, now is not the time for small plans.”

—Senator Barack Obama, accepting his party's nomination at Invesco Field

Denver, CO (11/5/2008)—After one of the most significant campaigns in decades, Barack Obama is the next president of the United States. With his victory comes a shift in White House leadership and the promise of change led by the Democrats. Obama's win marks the final act in a buildup of momentum that started this past summer at the Democratic National Convention held in Denver, Colorado.

Democratic National Convention 2008: Obama's Mile High Moment is a celebration of the recent DNC held in Denver. The book, done in cooperation with The Denver Post, features more than 100 color images captured during the convention.

Award-winning photographers and journalists from The Denver Post and MediaNews Group were on hand to document every moment of the convention. They captured the drama of the speeches, rallies, and protests, along with unscripted moments and local color.

The Denver Post and Fulcrum Publishing have compiled the best images from that historic week, creating not only a tribute to the hard work of Denver and the Democratic Party, which ultimately led to success on Election Day, but also a dramatic tribute to the power of the promise of change and the importance of this moment in our nation's history.

“This November, the torch will be passed again to a new generation of Americans. The work begins anew. The hope rises again. And the dream lives on.”

—Senator Ted Kennedy
